So, that's why I am a Buddhist. We take on the label—but we don't need to make a big deal about it. We take refuge in the three jewels, seeing the Buddha as a model or example of a fully actualized human being, we commit to practicing the Buddha's teachings (dharma), and to travel the path with the community of practitioners (sangha) ...

Why am I a Buddhist? | elephant journal

To be a Buddhist, we don't need to wear any special clothing, change our eating habits, or give up material possessions or a social life. It's as simple as changing our perception — not taking the obstacles that come our way so seriously, and seeing everything around us as interesting and full of potential. Simple to say but not always easy to do.

What makes a Buddhist and how do you become Buddhist?

Many people associate Buddhist religious practice with silent, interior meditation. But the practice of vocalizing, reciting and chanting various teachings has played a vitally important role in the history of Buddhism. Nichiren's practice of chanting Nam-myoho-renge-kyo encompasses both.
